“ I'm always thinking of Andrew any time a Beatles song plays on the radio or I'm passing Buc-ee's being reminded of all the times we all made evening trips out to San Marcos for a trip to the electronics store Hastings or just to get away and enjoy each other's company in the car. Andrew was the kind of guy who always has a positive attitude and can have a good laugh even during the worst times.

During our early years of college I remember Andrew driving us to our downtown campus class. The highlight of those days would be singing some weird song like "Handsome" by Peeland Z and just goofing off before we had to go up and down the parking aisles screaming as we couldn't find a spot and we would be late to class once more.

I'll remember the Saturdays we spent playing another one of Matt's horrible low budget Wii games and sharing a good laugh over how horrible the production value and voice actors were for Are You Smarter Than a Fifth Grader.

The time Andrew convinced me to change careers and join his work might have been one of the biggest mistakes I made, but we both had so many great laughs over it and he made that time memorable. The funny clip art emails we sent to each other, waiting for his laugh across the rows of cubicles between us.

I could keep going on about memories, but over all Andrew was a big part of my life from high school up until now. I'm not a talkative person and I don't know if I ever really let him know how great of a friend he was, but I'm so thankful for the time I could spend with Andrew.

“ If there is one memory of Andrew that can even possibly scratch the surface of him. It's the time in Highschool when we all went to Smashburger, and he ordered a Hot Dog. Didn't even finish eating it.

Or Him Matt and I getting lost at Latin State and almost getting run over by a golf cart.

Or watching the Royal Rumble with him and booing Roman Reigns and Cena.

Or the time we all swam, and enjoyed Ciders all afternoon.

Or all the times he would laugh at my horrible jokes and how he would come back with his own. That's probably what I'll miss most.

“ There's so much to say, and so much to talk about when you think of Andrew, picking just one memory to mention is really hard. I had known him since 2006, so there's literally countless memories and stories to revisit. Whether it was sinking in our cardboard taco, or looking at how mad he was at the people playing piano in the band hall, or his pitch perfect performance as an irrigation salesperson, whatever that is, during a fake commercial Mac and I had to make. Or I'll never forget his reaction to trying preworkout for the first time, or how hilariously angry he got at Michael for not eating the dinner he made. I could go on and on about so many memories but this is just one that comes to mind.

Andrew really pushed me to go to trivia on Sundays, which was the most fun I had in years honestly. Andrew, Suze and Matt got the whole crew together for the first time in who knows how long, and it recaptured some of the comadarie that had brought us all together. We went to trivia like every Sunday for that entire summer, we even got to city finals and it was due to Andrew because he was the Cap.

Anyways we had this sort of team tradition where if we got first, we'd get this beer from Colorado called the Yeti. It was a stupid strong dark beer that kicked your ass and because of that we all would get that for getting first. It was kind of like a reward for ourselves for laying the smackdown. I would also get it if we did bad, because it was so strong but I digress.

Andrew wasn't always a beer guy. He always drank Guinness, which I busted his ass for all the time as the group's resident craft beer nerd. But he'd get a yeti here and there if we deserved it. There was one time where we did well, and we got our yetis and were enjoying ourselves but Andrew was just sippin' his very slowly. Andrew didn't really like all the strong stuff at first, I had to "educate" him. Like I said he swore by Guinness forever ugh. Anyways, we kept talking and talking and going on with our night and Andrew had still barely touched his drink.

Night went on, we weren't really paying attention and then all of the sudden, we all heard a glass hit the table, and we all turned our heads to see what happened. Andrew had done the unthinkable, and had chugged his entire glass of Yeti. A 9.5 abv monster of a beer! We were all so shocked and worried about how much he was going to throw up, but it was also absolutely hilarious so we laughed our asses off. Its one of the countless times that Andrew made us laugh. Kind of sums up a bit about him. He was always down for a few beers, but more importantly he always made time for all of us, for all of his friends.

I miss you so much man. I love you.
