My entire family is grateful to Mando for so many things, and we already are feeling a gaping hole in our lives from his absence. I have so many wonderful memories of him, going back 45 years when he first started working with Rick in his company. No one worked harder than Mando, and his sheer physical bravery was LEGENDARY. We have a poster-size photo of him dangling solo from a bosun's chair from the roof of the Tower Life building in downtown San Antonio, for example. Incredible! I remember how affectionate he always was with our son, James. When I visited jobsites with James as a baby, Mando would pick him up and carry him around to show him what the crew was doing. When James was a toddler, and Mando was staying with us during the week and helping with jobs in Houston, James liked nothing better than to be with Mando after work, waiting for a tortilla to come off the comal and enjoying some conjunto music. And, perhaps most significantly, when James was tasked with running his own company, Mando was kind enough to come out of retirement to help him. They were a great team until the very end: my 34-year-old son, and his much admired, 83-year-old mentor, the one and only, Armando Alavarez. The Foxfire factory now seems a very quiet and lonely place without Mando's exuberant presence. His wisdom, humor, hard work, and sheer zest for life will be missed, always. Margaret and family, we love you as we loved Mando, and you are in our prayers.
